

YURTS of UTAH

YURTS 9-10: TUSHAR MOUNTAIN TOURS

YURT 10 SNORKELING ELK YURT

Location: Tushar Mountain Range; near Beaver

Length: 4.6 miles one-way

Elevation: John Flat Road trailhead: 8640'; Yurt 10,400'

Size: 20' diameter; sleeps 8 on four wood slabs; room for 2 more on the floor

Amenities: Propane lantern and Coleman® two-burner stove; pots, pans, utensils, plates and mugs; shovels, axe for splitting firewood; wood stove and firewood. A forest service outhouse sits just outside the yurt.

Introduction: From the front door of Snorkeling Elk yurt the view is a frame made of Engleman Spruce, the picture includes the Cedar Mountains, Brianhead, and the Pine Valley mountains by St. George. The view elicits a feeling of vastness, solitude, and awe.

Along with a pristine view, if you're yurting in order to find that backcountry snow haven, you'll find it here. Of all the yurts in Utah, this one can boast the most accessible and abundant ski terrain—the best part, it's just out the backdoor (so to speak). If you gave yourself a week at the yurt you couldn't cover all the prominently featured bowls, not to mention the terrain you'll find down the other side when you get to the top of the bowl. Check your maps for Poison Creek, Griffith Creek, Delano Peak—the highest peak in the Tushar range at 12,173', and Bullion Canyon.

That being said, let me also add that Snorkeling Elk yurt is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, yurt in use in the state. It was constructed 19 years ago and has seen almost that many years of use. Duct tape appears to be key in holding this snowtel together.

Found in the vicinity of a now defunct Elk Meadows ski resort, the two yurts owned by Tushar Mountain Tours promise solitude. The area smacks of ghost town in a mountain range few people currently visit mid-winter. Tushar

Mountain Tours offers a variety of options for your group, everything from renting the yurt to hauling your gear, providing chef services, or a guide to show you the best skiing. Alec, the owner, will work with you to provide just what your group needs.
